This article highlights the case of SEC v. Citigroup, in which the defendants accepted a consent decree for fraudulently issuing a collateralized debt obligation without admitting or denying guilt. The US District Court judge, Jed Rakoff, rejected the decree, arguing that there was insufficient information to determine whether it was fair, adequate, reasonable, and in the public interest. In this case study, the authors examine the SEC's practice of settling enforcement actions that allege serious patterns of fraud. They find that corporate and bank fraud is successfully diverted from the criminal courts to the civil fraud arena, taking the form of consent decrees in which the offending party negotiates a penalty, usually in the form of a modest fine without an admission of liability. The Court of Appeals stayed the case while it considered the questions presented by the appeal, ruling that the SEC and Citigroup had a high likelihood of success on the merits.

It Has a Fancy Name, but Will It Get Tough?

PRESIDENT OBAMA told the nation last week that he was convening a task force to investigate the abusive practices in the mortgage industry that led to our economic woes. Both lending and the practice of bundling loans into securities will come under scrutiny, he said, adding: "This new unit will hold accountable those who broke the law, speed assistance to homeowners and help turn the page on an era of recklessness that hurt so many Americans." Some greeted this new task force — its unwieldy name is the Residential Mortgage-Backed Securities Working Group — with skepticism. It is an election year, after all, and many might wonder if this is just a public-relations response to the outrage against the institutions and executives punishing wrongdoing. Their record in these pursuits has been disappointing so far. This is especially so, considering the evidence of wrongdoing unearthed in private lawsuits against mortgage originators and securities firms in recent years.

According to the S.E.C.'s Web site, the commission has filed 25 such cases since 2009. A total of 46 top executives have been sued and 25 individuals have been penalized, either by being barred from their industry or from acting as a corporate director or officer, or by no longer being permitted to appear before the S.E.C. and lawyers representing
