Screen-shot of Abstract

Communicating Leadership A Discourse Analytical Perspective on the Job Advertisement

Inger Askehave

Aalborg University, Aalborg, Denmark, ia@adm.aau.dk

Abstract

This article explores the complex relationship between recruitment needs (whom to recruit) and recruitment communications (what message to communicate—and with what effect) in a Danish bank. It reports in part a large research project investigating a gender and career program launched by the human resource department in a Danish, medium-sized bank chain (referred to as "the Bank"). Using the Bank's main written recruitment centre (the bank manager job ad) as a case in point, and including the

Does Business Writing Require Information Literacy?

Abstract

Although the business community increasingly recognizes information literacy as central to its work, there remains the critical problem of measurement: How should employers assess the information literacy of their current or potential workers? In this article, we use a commercially available assessment to investigate the relationship between information literacy and the key business communication skill of business writing. Information literacy scores obtained prior to instruction predicted performance in an undergraduate, upper-division business writing course. Similar results emerged regardless of whether participants considered English their best language.
